Still the growth of a city is extremely uncertain and arbitrary. A business room may rent for $2,000 a year on a principal street, and right around the corrier on another street it would not bring $300. When the big new court house was to be built in Springfield, a good many people had an idea that business houses would run down Market and Limestone streets, and along Columbia to meet it, but, strange to say, the court house is left standing alone in gloony grandeur in the residence portion of the city without a sizer near it. It seems that the whole enterprise was one of wind—a mouth organ affair merely, and that no organis were really manufactured. Now if that organ factory had been started at Springfield instead of New Carlisle, the probabilities are that it would now be turning out organs at a lively rate, and would be in prosperous circumstances. Why a man should locate a factory in a little place like New Carlisle, within a few miles of Springfield, when there is plenty of room here, is utterly uncomprehensible. If a manufacturer expects to succeed he must.
